Job Description

Job Summary

1.1 Background

This impact-oriented applied research project is intended to support better models of landscape-scale Conservation Governance through a collaborative training position created between the AWF and the OPALS Programme (https://opals-exeter.org/) led by the University of Exeter. Oppenheimer Impact Scholar Isaac Nduta has a background in actuarial science and has just finished his 12-month MSc in Conservation and Biodiversity, where he developed skills in applied geospatial ecology. His dissertation project titled "Using the Relative Productivity Index to assess how governance structures and local community engagement influence rangeland health outcomes" applied the Relative Productivity Index (RPI), a new indicator of rangeland condition (Lomax et al. 2025), to undertake a novel evaluation of spatial and temporal patterns that relate to local governance/management influences (see Appendix for details).

The aim of this Impact project is for the Research Assistant to make a material contribution to AWF's operations to support ecosystem-level conservation in the Amboseli & Tsavo landscapes, going beyond species-level protection to integrate the health and connectivity of the entire ecosystem.

In the first phase of his post, the research Assistant has been managed by Dr Andy Cunliffe, in partnership with Dr Philip Muruthi, Dr Tom Powell, and Dr Kimberley Hockings. The second phase is a 12-month placement at AWF's Field Office in the Tsavo Landscape, co-managed by the Landscape Manager and Andy Cunliffe (Exeter).

Proposed focus for project Phase 2

1. The proposed focus of the Research Assistant's contribution is to explore the management applications of the Relative Productivity Index (RPI). This would include clarifying the value of RPI as a tool for adaptive management in rangeland landscapes and how RPI could be integrated into AWF's landscape management workflows, both as a monitoring and evaluation indicator and to identify degradation hotspots for prioritisation in restoration areas. This is expected to take 80% of the time, while 20% will be spent on advanced geospatial modelling using machine learning to first produce, and then evaluate, RPI maps at a finer (30 m) spatial grain to improve correspondence with management-relevant spatial scales. This work will utilise a GPP product (https://landcarbonlab.org/insights/global-productivity-data-ecosystem-health and https://peerj.com/articles/19774/) and the University of Exeter's computing facilities.

2. Implement RPI modelling using the machine learning in R (MLR3) ecosystem on TESS Lab high-performance workstations at the University of Exeter. Upgrade the RPI machine learning algorithm from random forest to LightGBM to improve model performance and scalability. Increase dynamic covariates (e.g., antecedent precipitation) and optimise feature selection routines (Bayesian optimization).

3. Identification of degradation 'hotspots' as areas of elevated concern due to low mean RPI and/or negative RPI trends for investigation using either on-the-ground and/or fine-resolution optical imagery (this might highlight the spatial effects of bomas and/or biospheres around natural and/or artificial water points).

4. Supporting the Landscape Team in their prioritisation of areas for landscape-scale conservation, informing resource allocation.

Supporting these primary objectives, secondary objectives include:

1) Communicate dissertation research findings to wider audiences by (i) writing a short and accessible 3-page summary of dissertation findings for wider dissemination and (ii) refining dissertation findings for publication as a scientific paper.
2) Gather high-quality spatial data on AWF interventions by working with stakeholders to collate existing and collect new geospatial records of where, when, and what interventions have been undertaken by AWF through desk-based and field-based digitisation and interviews.
3) Support AWF's policy and advocacy efforts to advance landscape-level conservation. Isaac will support any aspect of AWF's policy and advocacy efforts at the landscape including but not limited to utilising his actuarial background to support innovations in financing landscape-scale conservation.
4) Support uptake of Open Research tools and approaches. To increase organisational awareness of options to enhance transparency and integrity in workflows, and potentially lower expenditure on software licence fees, Isaac could run a training session for AWF colleagues on Open Research practice (https://tess-lab.org/resources/open-research/) and Free and Open Source Software tools (https://tess-lab.org/resources/free-and-open-source-software-used-in-tess-lab/).
5) Present on this project at the Oppenheimer Research Conference in South Africa in October
